Visions of the 21st Century Family: Transforming Structures and Identities (Contemporary Perspectives in Family Research) By Patricia Neff Cluster

One undeniable fact about families is that they keep changing, both in terms of structure and behavior. Many factors have served to bring about such changes, including social, cultural, political, and institutional change, resulting in family forms which perhaps may represent the new 'traditional' in the not-so-distant future. Through research studies from around the world, this volume examines these changing structures and behaviors, and attempts to better illustrate the ever-changing nature of families. Topics covered include: transracial adoption, lesbian parenting, intergenerational relationships, procreative identities, ex-spouse relationships, military couples, the meaning of remarriage, and gender roles within contemporary families, among other topics. This volume, along with future volumes of CPFRR, utilizes a wide variety of methodological and theoretical approaches, and attempts to provide a comprehensive examination of change in family structures and behaviors.

Review

Editors Cluster (Edinboro University) and Blair (State University of New York-Buffalo) unite US and international contributors in sociology, family studies, human development, and health areas such as addiction and nutrition. They survey recent research and report on specific studies related to changing family forms, roles, and behaviors. Some specific subjects explored are dual military couples, the traditional family unit in Zimbabwe, homeless adults in southeast Texas, perceptions of donor-conceived offspring in lesbian-parent and heterosexual-parent families, and transracial adoption and the process of racial socialization.
